Organic Farms

Organic Farms rely on ecologically sustainable farming practices. They do not use synthetic fertilizers, pesticides or genetically modified organisms and animals are treated humanely. When organic food is processed, chemical preservatives or synthetic additives are not used. These farms are inspected and certified by a third party.

Natural Farms

Natural Farms may use many of the same practices as an organic farm but they are not certified by a third party. Interested consumers must ask the farmer directly about standard practices. Consumers looking for fruits or vegetables can ask if pesticides, herbicides or synthetic fertilizers are being used. If you're looking for animal products, ask about the type of feed being used and if the animals are pastured or confined.

Seeds & Breeds

Modern conventional farming relies on a very small number of genetically similar breeds. These animals are bred for high production in a very controlled, high density environment. Consequently, these populations are very inbred. Over time genetic weaknesses arise.

Conventional farming also uses hybrid seeds, which are produced by artificial cross-pollination. Unfortunately, hybrid seeds cannot be saved. The seeds do not reproduce true copies so new seeds must be purchased each year.

The great thing about heirloom seeds and heritage breeds is that they are a "storehouse" of genetic diversity.
